a. Stroop test

Stroop test and color blindness test- For color blindness test participants were asked to identify light-coloured numbers on dark backgrounds and for Stroop test, participants were provided with two sets of words printed in different colors on two different papers and asked to name the color of the ink in which each word was printed. The reaction time (RT) and accuracy scores were recorded for each participant. The results showed a significant difference in performance between the participants, with the younger age group performing better than the older. These results have important implications for the study of color blindness, cognitive control and attention/ concentration deficiency. 150 students of all streams were benefitted.
